"The western municipal elections, encouraging as they must be to the houseful Democrat, are only straws pointing the direction of victory in 1892. The solid groundwork of Democratic hope of success four years hence lies in the important facts that the Democratic party has a popular majority of over 94,000 votes, and that it has parted company with Carlisle, Mills, and other like betrayers of genuine Democratic principles. Under the leadership of Samuel J. Randali, on a platform favoring repeal of the internal-revenue system, the next presidential election will return the Democratic party triumphantly to power. Men may erras leaders and the party may suffer temporarily, but the true principles of Democracy are suited to the genius and aspirations of the American people, and whenever correctly interpreted and fauthfully applied are sure to win popular support.
